It's a beautiful sweater with a big bobble-and-eyelet flower on the front. So imagine my dismay when, about two weeks later, I got a copy of "The New Knitting Stitch Library," by Lesley Stanfield. To my surprise, right there on page 146 was the flower design from Mellor's book. Mellor's design is identical to Stanfield's. Every stitch, bobble and eyelet is the same. Not a single element is different. Here's the problem: Stansfield's book was published in 1992--a whopping 12 years before Mellor's was published in 2004. It's not that Mellor used somebody else's stitch pattern. There's no such thing as a new stitch pattern--every possible stitch that could be created has been done. But this isn't a stitch pattern. It's a design. And it's a design that Mellor uses as the principal element in an "original" sweater. Neither Stanfield's nor Mellor's book includes a bibliography, and neither author mentions any other books or designers. So it's hard to tell exactly what happened here. But given the 12-year difference in publication dates, it's likely that the flower design belongs to Stanfield. If Mellor "borrowed" this design without giving Stanfield credit, I'm really disappointed. If not, I'd sure appreciate somebody clarifying this for me!
